Executive Summary

This report is a bibliography of more than 800 plant checklists and vegetation surveys held by the Department of Conservation for areas in Wellington Conservancy.

Checklists and survey data are a source of information about plant distributions and have a variety of applications to the protection of biological diversity.

The Department of Conservation holds this database of information in Wellington (P.O. Box 5086, Wellington). Copies of the plant checklists have also been deposited at the following places:

- Botany Department, Auckland Institute and Museum, Auckland;
- herbarium, Museum of New Zealand Te Papa Tongarewa (WELT), Wellington;
- library, Landcare Research, Lincoln; and
- herbarium keeper, School of Biological Sciences, Victoria University of Wellington (WELTU).

1. Introduction

In six years the Department of Conservation has gathered over 800 plant checklists for areas in the Wellington Conservancy (Map 1). Vegetation surveys, such as those compiled for the Protected Natural Areas Programme, have also been collated. This document provides a reference to all those sources of information about plant biogeography in Wellington Conservancy (excluding the Chatham Islands). This report is an updated version of a previous bibliography (Sawyer 1998) and complements a plant checklist bibliography for the Chatham Islands (Sawyer 2000). Since that first edition in 1998 over 300 plant lists have been added to the database. The lists and survey data have been arranged by Ecological District, and for each district the lists have been sorted by principal geographical area (Table 1). The distribution of checklists in Wellington Conservancy is shown in Map 2.

Checklists for non-vascular plants are also included. Appendix 1 is a list of all authors and author combinations (176) for references in this bibliography. The number of lists compiled by each is shown after the authors name. Major contributors to the region's plant database through the compilation of plant checklists include: Tony Druce, Barbara Mitcalfe, Chris Horne, Pat Enright, Isobel Gabites, Colin Ogle, Maggy Wassilieff, Aalbert Rebergen, Olaf John, Wellington Botanical Society, Andrew Townsend, Nick Singers, Tony Silbery and the Department of Conservation.

Plant checklists (providing an inventory of plant species found at a particular place at a given time) and vegetation surveys have a variety of uses. They are used to evaluate the conservation status of indigenous plant species. They are also used in the development of weed control strategies, for monitoring the changing condition of vegetation and for setting priorities for land protection.

There are various other sources of information about the distribution of plants in Wellington Conservancy. They include herbaria, scientific reports (e.g., Partridge 1992) and journals (e.g., the Transactions of the New Zealand Institute). The Department of Conservation has used information from those sources in development of the region's plant databases. However, references to that information has not been included in this report.

1.1 THE USE OF PLANT CHECKLISTS AND VEGETATION SURVEY DATA

Plant checklists and other vegetation survey data sets can be used as a source of information about the geographical distribution of plants. They provide an inventory of biological information for an area and an insight into the plant composition of that area at a particular time. The information presented here has been used by the Department of Conservation to evaluate the conservation status of all indigenous vascular plants found in the Wellington Conservancy. The information has also been used to determine whether species of indigenous plants have a geographical distribution that does not coincide with areas set aside for the protection of biological diversity.

Checklists or survey data sheets can be used for comparative analysis of future changes in plant composition and, therefore, is a monitoring tool. A plant checklist or survey plot data can serve as a guide for anyone visiting a particular place. Detailed plant checklists and survey data for a particular spatial area can also be used and applied in the description and classification of plant communities.

Some plant checklists and vegetation survey data include exotic plants (adventives or non-natives) as well as indigenous species. In those cases that information may be used to determine the geographical distribution of pest plants and may be used to develop strategies for pest plant control.

1.2 LIMITATIONS OF CHECKLISTS AND SURVEY DATA

Plant checklists and the data from vegetation surveys often vary in quality. In some cases the exact area for which the information was compiled is not described. In other cases the amount of search effort is not described. For example, one checklist may have been compiled during one two-hour visit to an area, while another list may be based on numerous visits to the same place at various times of the year over a number of years.

For some plant checklists it is not always clear when the inventory was completed and the date when the checklist was completed is not specified. Some checklists are limited because they are cumulative. Plant taxa not seen during a previous visit may be added to a checklist. However, plant taxa are rarely deleted from lists if they are not seen on any one particular visit. Vegetation succession and disturbance can lead to some species disappearing from an area but it is not always possible to state categorically that a particular species no longer occurs in a specified area. The cumulative nature of some lists can be misleading about what still occurs in an area at a particular time.

Checklist and survey plot data is often not verifiable. Herbarium specimens are rarely collected to verify observations of all plant taxa included on checklists and plot sheets, and so it is not possible to check that the recorded observation was accurate. For some groups of plants the information may become inaccurate because the listed plant taxa have undergone taxonomic revision since the list was compiled. Lists and survey data sheets are rarely updated to reflect the current taxonomic nomenclature. For example, some lists record Pellaea sp. nov. because they were written before Pellaea callidirupium was formally described. Some authors updated their lists regularly but in general the lists reflect the nomenclature of the time when they were written. Some old plant checklists and survey plot sheets record species such as Paratrophis banksii and Elytranthe tetrapetala for which alternative names Streblus banksii and Peraxilla tetrapetala have been proposed and more or less accepted.

Some authors cite previous records from past workers. Some plant species have been included in checklists despite the fact that those species have long since disappeared from the area or were not seen by the person compiling the checklist. The listing of historic records in current checklists can lead to confusion as to when the plant was last recorded in the area. This problem can be overcome if it is clearly stated in the checklist that certain plant taxa were not seen during the survey but have been observed in the past by a particular person at a particular time.

Any plant checklist or survey data reflects the botanical competency of the author(s) of the list at the time the data were collected. In addition, the information is only as good as the amount of effort put into field survey and plant identification by the author(s). In general for the plant checklists and vegetation survey data sets included in this report the level of botanical competency of the authors is high. One can be confident that for most taxonomic groups of dicotyledonous and monocotyledonous plants the checklists and survey plot data are a good record of what occurs (or occurred) in the areas visited.

One other limitation with many plant checklists is that they are not published and knowledge of their existence is limited to a few people. Copies of unpublished plant checklists can be difficult to obtain. Copies of plant checklists not already included in this bibliography may be sent to the Department of Conservation to be included in the conservancy's plant database.

1.3 OTHER INFORMATION SOURCES ABOUT PLANT DISTRIBUTIONS

In addition to published and unpublished checklists of plants and vegetation survey data sets (compiled as part of standardised survey programmes) there are various other sources of information about the geographical distribution of plants in Wellington Conservancy. Some examples include: herbarium records (e.g., herbaria at Auckland, Christchurch, Wellington, Victoria University of Wellington and at the Forest Research Institute); scientific reports (e.g., Partridge 1992), journals (e.g., the Transactions of the New Zealand Institute) and bulletins (e.g., the Wellington Botanical Society Bulletin), unpublished research theses held at universities (e.g., Victoria University of Wellington). References to plant distribution information from many of the above sources have not been compiled in this bibliography.

1.4 LOCATION OF PLANT CHECKLISTS AND SURVEY DATA

A complete set of copies of all the plant checklists included in this bibliography is held by the Department of Conservation at Wellington Conservancy, P.O. Box 5086, Wellington. The vegetation survey plot data sets and Protected Natural Areas survey information is also held by the Department of Conservation at Wellington

Conservancy. Additional copies of the plant checklists (but not the vegetation survey data) have been deposited at the following places:

- Botany Department of the Auckland Museum in Auckland;
- Herbarium of the Museum of New Zealand Te Papa Tongarewa (WELT) in Wellington;
- Landcare Research library at Lincoln; and
- Herbarium at the School of Biological Sciences, Victoria University of Wellington.

2. How to compile a plant checklist

Various methods are used to compile plant checklists (when not part of a standardised vegetation survey). The following method is that used in Wellington Conservancy by staff of the Department of Conservation.

A complete survey of the boundary of the area is done, followed by at least two traverses across the site at right angles to the main topographical features. Where there are no clear features to traverse, the search should follow a figure of eight path.

Larger areas should be subdivided into smaller search areas for which separate plant checklists can be prepared. Several visits should be made to an area at different times of the year as some species are not always visible. Some species can be identified reliably only at certain times. Identification of some species such as sun orchids (Thelymitra sp.) may be possible only at certain times of the day and therefore surveyors should consider this as they plan fieldwork.

The following information should be provided with each plant checklist:

- The year and date when the list was compiled.
- The search effort (an indication of the number of people who visited the area and the time spent in the field searching for plants).
- The names of people involved in preparing the list.
- A map showing the area that was searched and for which the plant checklist was prepared.
- The central grid reference of the area searched.
- For each listed taxon an indication of its abundance (common, uncommon, or specify the number of individual plants seen).
- The location of any herbarium vouchers for any of the plant taxa recorded.
- An explanation of any abbreviations used in the list (e.g., unc. = uncommon)

The following structural, functional or taxonomic classes may be used for grouping species in a list: gymnosperm trees; monocotyledon trees and shrubs; dicotyledon trees and shrubs; monocotyledon lianes; dicotyledon lianes; lycopods (clubmosses) and psilopsids (fossil ferns); ferns; orchids; grasses; sedges; rushes; monocotyledon herbs (other than orchids, grasses, sedges and rushes); composite herbs; dicotyledon herbs (other than composites); adventives. Species should be listed alphabetically within each group.

Another way is to list species in alphabetical order without groups. Exotic species are commonly indicated by an asterisk and can be listed either among the indigenous species or separately.

Occurrences of plant species recorded previously should be cited when they have not been seen during a survey. Records of previous visitors should be clearly identified on the list. When old records are included, then the following information should be provided: the name of the person who recorded the plant previously at the site; the date of the observation; and a citation of the reference to that record (or the herbarium specimen).

3. Checklists and survey data

Checklists of non-vascular plants denoted by an asterisk (*). Checklists of exotic or adventive plant species are denoted by two asterisks (). Some checklists are included more than once if they refer to more than one geographic area or have been prepared for areas that cross Ecological District boundaries.

4. Acknowledgements

Many people have helped create this plant checklist bibliography. The authors of each list are thanked for their hard work compiling the lists and for diligently recording their observations of plant occurrences throughout the region.

I also thank the following people for providing plant lists for inclusion in the plant databases of Wellington Conservancy: Colin Ogle, Rodney Lewington, Phil Brady, Mike Oates, Paul Hughes; Chris Horne; Maggy Wassilieff, Barbara Mitcalfe, Iris Coulter, Peter de Lange, Pat Enright and Margaret Aitken.

I am grateful to Jeremy Rolfe, Paul Hughes, Phil Brady, Geoff Rogers and Chris Horne for comments on earlier drafts of this report. I thank Phil Brady for compiling a list of vegetation surveys for Wellington Conservancy.

I am especially grateful to Barabara Mitcalfe, Chris Horne and Pat Enright for access to their personal plant checklists and for their efforts to ensure I had copies of them for use in developing this database.
